WIND TOO FRISKY TO PERMIT FLIGHT

But Orville Expected to Go Up Till Sunset.

ARMY MEN THERE WITH BAND

Orphans Join the Crowd of the Curious Who Insist Upon Seeing a Heavier-than-air Ship Sail Over Fort Myer-Herring Granted Time in Which to Try His Machine.

A wind varying from sixteen to twentyfive miles an hour kept the Wright aeroplane in the shed at Fort Myer all yesterday, and throughout the afternoon kept a crowd of 3,500 persons standing around in vain expectation of a flight.

That Orville expects to go up as soon as the weather gives him a chance, is shown by the fact that both he and Wilbur stayed in the aeroplane shed until closlng-up time, at 6:30 o'clock, on the chance that the wind might drop. At times a small sized gale blew, which fell at other times to gentle zephyrs, that revived the hopes of the crowd. It was puffy, though, and fickle, and after each lull the quarrel broke out afresh, with the calm no nearer at hand.

A number of Representatives journeyed out to the fort, and some of them were admitted to the shed and the privacy of Take Interesting Game from the aviators. Of the eminent men of the day before, Secretary of War Dickinson and John Barrett, director of the International Bureau of the American Republies, were the only repeaters.

Sized Things Up.

Maj. Foltz, in charge of the policing of the grounds, galloped around on his horse for a while, sizing things up and giving directions for the clearing of the field in case Wilbur stopped crossing his fingers. In his hand the major carried something that looked like a red feather duster. To the undisciplined and irreverent eye it was not evident whether the tickler was a sign of authority or to keep off the files. It was a cute little thing, though, any way you looked at it.

Probably on the theory that "music the army men had the band on the job, sake alone they were agreeably surprise so that all through the afternoon if any when the Elks and Knights of Columbia casual malediction sprang to the tip of put teams in the field representing the a dusty tongue, it was lost on a flood of best talent in these parts, the former harmony from the north end of the field.

The usual precedent governing the working hours of the band had to be stretched a bit to have it play on Saturday afternoon, but it showed that the army men out to see a flight.

In charge of two representatives of the orphanage from which they came, they sat on a long piece that he looked the easiest proposition of wood back a little way from the aero- ever. plane shed. With not two inches difference in their heights, and their heights nothing to brag about from the vulgar standpoint of quantity, they reminded one of the ditty about "Ten Little Injuns," or of a row of turtles on a log.

Question as to Sex.

Whether one sex or more was represented among them did not appear from their costumes, which were alike in every detail, even to the cloth suspenders crossing over their shoulders. Trousers and shirts were of blue gingham, and there was nothing doing when it came to coats and hats.

Secretary of War Dickinson yesterday decided to grant to A. M. Herring, the New York aeroplane inventor, an extension of time until August 1 in which to nish his machine by July 1, but failed to appear. He sent word to the War Department that he had been sick and unable to attend to his business. He asked an extension until August 15.
